Supporting learning at home during COVID-19

Context

We've started to learn more about parents' experiences navigating home learning, preventing learning loss, and gauging what they need from schools and districts during the COVID-19 pandemic. Our goal is to provide parents with resources they need and share our insights about their experiences to inform your work as you help support families across the country.

Experts across the country have been navigating a tremendous challenge regarding the reopening of school buildings this fall. We were curious about whether parents are being invited to join in on the conversation regarding plans for fall and beyond.

Findings

Our most recent survey of GreatSchools.org users (n=1,323) reveals the following:

We asked parents if their schools or districts had shared plans for fall:

- As of July 2, 76% of parents who visited our website reported that their schools or districts have not announced their plans for fall.

We asked respondents whether they have had the opportunity to get involved in guiding the return to school:

- 52% of parents indicated that they have not had the opportunity to get involved or are not aware of any opportunities to do so.
- 45% of parents said that they have had the opportunity to get involved through surveys, task forces, or virtual meetings.
